Publishable summary

A software application called LEAFS is developed to manage the research data from the consortium. It is able to function as an electronic laboratory notebook to log experimental details online and there is a function built in that allows to view, compare and exchange results amongst the consortium partners.

SIMBA participants get the ability to log-in and upload new experiments protocols and results and see what others have done. Each experiment can be put on private, shared (amongst the SIMBA consortium) or made publicly available.

When one of the partners will publish a scientific paper, we will assess whether both the researchers and the publishing journal are willing to make the data publicly available on LEAFS.

The platform is built to be able to scale to more researchers and university groups.
